Deadly Virus Is Identified in Outbreak in Zaire

By LAWRENCE K. ALTMAN

Scientists have found preliminary evidence that the Ebola virus, one of the deadliest infectious agents known, is the cause of a mysterious disease that has broken out in Zaire, World Health Organization diseases in developed countries. A major reason for the spread in poorer countries appears to be that hospitals often lack adequate supplies of needles and syringes, making their reuse necessary. In addition, doctors and nurses may not always obey two cardinal principles of medicine: washing their hands and using anti-septic techniques, because clean water is not always available. Federal and international health officials are warning of the spread of airports to check for signs among travelers from Zaire. Health officials also want doctors to consider the possibility of a hemorrhagic fever in patients who have fever and bleed. James M. Hughes, an official at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said the new Ebola outbreak started in the city of Kinshasa, east of Kinshasa, Zaire. One of the principal tasks of scientists entering the country is to calm panic, said Dr. Hughes. W.H.O. information also says that hospitals in Zaire

Death of a Rancher in Texas Is Attributed to 'Killer Bees'

HARLINGEN, Tex., July 19 (AP) — Federal agricultural officials say the honeybees that killed an 82-year-old rancher last week were the Africanized variety known as killer bees.

"Our lab has confirmed that the bees are Africanized," said Kim Kaplan, a spokeswoman for the Federal Department of Agriculture in Greenbelt, Md. Final autopsy results are not yet available, but the pathologist who did the autopsy listed the preliminary cause of death as acute fluid buildup in the lungs caused by insect stings.

If the cause of death is confirmed, the rancher, Lino Lopez, would be the first person killed in the United States by Africanized bees. The variety might have come from the Mexico
